'An innovative look at the European migration space that both specialists of migration and those interested in the history and current affairs of the 'Old Continent' – both 'old', 'new' and prospective EU member states – should find refreshing...Invaluable to postgraduate courses of migration and ethnic studies, European identity and politics, and contemporary European affairs.' – Demetrios Papademetriou, President of the Migration Policy Institute, Washington D.C., USA

Migration in the New Europe: East–West Revisited responds to demand for a study on migration and policy developments in the light of European Union enlargement. The innovative character of the book is its approach to the emerging European migration space. The editors argue that the concept of a common European migration space will replace the traditional division into East and West because of two simultaneous processes: The ongoing European Union enlargement and the creation of a common European Union immigration policy.
